The sad words of disabled teenager Emily echo the findings of a study out this week, which reported that disabled children's friendships, learning, communication, behaviour and health have suffered during lockdown.

The survey of 4,074 parents by the Disabled Children's Partnership (DCP) found that three-quarters of families have lost all their support during lockdown. Parents, brothers and sisters have taken on all care during the day and night, where needed.

The DCP says disabled children and their families have been locked out and wants the Government to make them a priority during the pandemic. Many disabled children have complex health issues, meaning they cannot return to school and need to continue shielding from COVID-19 with their families.

Nearly half of parents say their disabled children's physical health has got worse and up to 80% are battling with their mental health, too.

Amanda Batt from the DCP says: “As many begin to emerge from lockdown, spare a thought for those left in it.” Emily, 16, told First News: “Although we are highly aware of the challenges the Government is facing during this deadly pandemic, this particular part of society was already facing numerous cuts in services. Sadly, the lockdown has only made things worse. I have felt isolated and lonely. The Government must take this as a serious matter and we must all come together to make sure the voices of carers are heard.”

We took Emily to meet the Education Secretary, Gavin Williamson, at the end of last year. He said that making more activities available to disabled children would be a priority. This was promised again by the Department for Education last week.

“I HAVE felt isolated and lonely.”

by editor in chief Nicky Cox
What is this animal? What clues can you get from the picture? Why is it in the news?
Our New Local Hero

Playstation 5 Revealed

Prem returns!

Locked out in lockdown

How disabled children are struggling

The sad words of disabled teenager Emily echo the findings of a study out this week, which reported that disabled children’s friendships, learning, communication, behaviour and health have suffered during lockdown. The survey of 4,074 parents by the Disabled Children’s Partnership (DCP) found that three-quarters of families have lost all their support during lockdown. Parents, brothers and sisters have taken on all care during the day and night, where needed. The DCP says disabled children and their families have been locked out and wants the Government to make them a priority during the pandemic. Many disabled children have complex health issues, meaning they cannot return to school and need to continue shielding from COVID-19 with their families. Nearly half of parents say their disabled children’s physical health has got worse and up to 80% are battling with their mental health, too. Amanda Battan from the DCP says: “As many begin to emerge from lockdown, spare a thought for those left in it.” Emily, 16, told First News: “Although we are highly aware of the challenges the Government is facing during this deadly pandemic, this particular part of society was already facing numerous cuts in services. Sadly, the lockdown has only made things worse. I have felt isolated and lonely. The Government must take this as a serious matter and we must all come together to make sure the voices of carers are heard.” We took Emily to meet the Education Secretary, Gavin Williamson, at the end of last year. He said that making more activities available to disabled children would be a priority. This was promised again by the Department for Education last week. “I have felt isolated and lonely.” by editor in chief Nicky Cox
What is this?
What clues can you get from the picture?
Why is it in the news?

---

The sad words of disabled teenager Emily echo the findings of a study out this week, which reported that disabled children's friendships, learning, communication, behaviour and health have suffered during lockdown.

The survey of 4,074 parents by the Disabled Children's Partnership (DCP) found that three-quarters of families have lost all their support during lockdown. Parents, brothers and sisters have taken on all care during the day and night, where needed.

The DCP says disabled children and their families have been locked out and wants the Government to make them a priority during the pandemic.

Many disabled children have complex health issues, meaning they cannot return to school and need to continue shielding from COVID-19 with their families.

Nearly half of parents say their disabled children's physical health has got worse and up to 80% are battling with their mental health, too.

Amanda Batt of the DCP says: “As many begin to emerge from lockdown, spare a thought for those left in it.”

Emily, 16, told First News: “Although we are highly aware of the challenges the Government is facing during this deadly pandemic, this particular part of society was already facing numerous cuts in services. Sadly, the lockdown has only made things worse. I have felt isolated and lonely. The Government must take this as a serious matter and we must all come together to make sure the voices of carers are heard.”

We took Emily to meet the Education Secretary, Gavin Williamson, at the end of last year. He said that making more activities available to disabled children would be a priority. This was promised again by the Department for Education last week.

“I have felt isolated and lonely.”
1. Who are these people?
2. Where do you think they are?
3. Why are they in the news?

2. What is this animal?
2. What clues can you get from the picture?
3. Why is it in the news?

3. What is this?
4. What clues can you get from the picture?
5. Why is it in the news?